Aiming at that, the music artist and producer, Leonard Toma, presented the audiovisual art project Lands of the Mediterranean, specifically composed to capture Adrifort cross border identity. ## ADRIFORT FORTIFIED HERITAGE

Rocca Brancaleone in Ravenna (Italy) and Trojica Fort in the surroundings of Kotor (Montenegro) are the two protagonists of this issue's ADRIFORT Fortified Heritage.

Rocca Brancaleone - Italy

Rocca Brancaleone, whose structure was once part of the city walls, dates 1457. At the time, Ravenna was occupied by the Republic of Venice and, in order to protect this conquest, the Republic built a series of fortresses able to defend the territory. Despite having a uniform appearance, the building is divided in two distinct functional parts: Rocca - with its wide quadrilateral surface measuring 2180 squared meters and four impressive circular towers at its corners, joined by walls - and Cittadella - a 14.000 squared meter area once used to accommodate garrisons, food storage, weapons and stalls. Today it is one of the most visited green area in town. City walls surrounds the Citadel with its two circular and two semicircular defensive towers at its corners. Today, the Rocca welcomes several music and cinema events, while the citadel hosts a public garden, full of trees of great size. Here, visitors and citizens can find a playground, a skating rink, a cafeteria, fountains, benches and beautiful sandstone paths. There is also an educational trail with information boards describing the historical, architectural and functional features of Rocca Brancaleone, as well as informing visitors on the various tree types growing in the park.

Trojica Fort - Montenegro

From a military point of view, Trojica fortress is very important and has an operational tactical importance which means that its holding significantly affects the operation over a wide area. The battery is located on the pass that connects Kotor natural harbour and Tivat bay on the western slopes of Lovćen mountain and at the beginning of the peninsula Vrmac. Owing to the importance of its location the fort survived in spite of several demolitions and reconstructions. In this fortress, Petar I Petrović Njegoš and the French Marshal Marmont met in 1807. In 1813, battles were conducted over this fort between the French and Montenegrins. There was a fire in the storage of gunpowder in the course of the fight and the fortress suffered a devastating explosion. When the Austrians arrived, Trojica was immediately possessed (the existing three-storey tower was adapted and in the period 1875/1876 a new building was constructed and armed with four 120mm M04 cannons). Remains of the old three-storey fortress were preserved and incorporated into a single unit with the new facility. The new building is a single-storey semicircular fort with all the elements, and nowadays it appears in good state of preservation.
